A: The question has changed because your original was not really answerable. But maybe this will help. In the fallout over the Parkland, Fla., school shooting, gun control groups like Everytown for Gun Safety are throwing around numbers about how much more funding they need from private donors to keep the momentum going. In their latest fundraising pitch, they want you to donate $3,510 to a "Campaign for Change" and they'll match it dollar-for-dollar up to $3,510. That means, in reality, you can send the group $6,810 and receive $6,810 in return. Or, you can send $12,810 and receive that too! The group is promising to return all the funds donated until they hit $3,510, at which point they'll match donations until the entire $12,810 is donated. On its website, the group says it has collected more than $50 million in private money since 2014. Private gun control groups raised an average of $450,000 in 2017, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. Just two years ago, nearly $65 million in donations came from anti-gun groups. The problem is, none of this money is actually going to support a new legislative initiative in Congress or a state level campaign. For starters, the money comes from wealthy liberals who happen to want stricter gun control. The money does not go towards defending Second Amendment rights against unconstitutional legislation, like in Florida recently. "We're just a pure action group," Everytown spokeswoman Heidi Orthman said in an interview. "Just because we're called a campaign group doesn't mean we're a political action committee." Everytown has raised more than $36 million since 2014 but only $1 million went towards lobbying Congress or helping candidates. How Much Does It Cost to Lobbying Congress? A lot more money goes into lobbying Congress than you would think. According to OpenSecrets, lobbying expenditures and
